The stock market this morning displayed the same indifference to good news that it displayed last week to developments of an unfaverable nature. Speculative apathy was most marked. It became increasingly evident that the market is temporarily controlled by floor traders and a few newly formed

News over the week made it seem reasonably certain that the threatened railroad strike will not occur Some of the most powerful unions have refused to follow the lead of the Brotherhoods and vote a strike. To-day the Railroad Labor Board made the assertion that a strike is unlikely. On top of this President Gompers of the American Federation of Labor was quoted as ay ing that he is not in sympathy with failed to stimulate the railroad share list. Prices were mostly higher, it is true, and in a few so-lated instances net gains extended these gains were due more to a lack of supply of stocks in the ma-ket than to an increase in demand. Similar indifference to good news was displayed by the Mexican oil group. It has been a popular impression that these shares have been heavily sold because of spread of belief that the Mexican oil fields are drying up. This inorning the Department of Commerce issued a report on the Commerce issued a report on the condition of the Mexican fields which denied that the life of the fields is fast drawing to a close or half water has become or a likely salt water has become, or is likely become, a serious factor.

Mexican oils were among the weak-est on the list.

Most interest centred in Houston Oil. Endicott Johnson, the sugar shares, Pierce Arrow, Corn Products and other specialties that have recently demonstrated that they are responsive to pool operations. There was no appreciable change in the character of trading as the ses-sion progressed. Independent steels, which were more or less reactionary, in the first hour, regained early ary, in the first hour, regained early icsses, and there was a sharp forward spurt in Baldwin Locomotive which other equipments seemed unable to follow. Pierce Arrow extended early gains. Houston Oil ecored a net advance of 4 points. Other oils were irregular.

Mexican Petroleum, which showed a loss of about two points in early trading, rose to the closing figure of last week, while other leading cells went up from fractions to four points, with Houston showing the largest gain. Steels finally broke away from the lethargy which characterized early dealings and rose fractionally. Rails, too, were appreciably firmer.

A large part of bullish operations was centred in the equipments. Baldwin rose about three points and most other equipment shares were able to rise a point or more. American Brake Shoe went up three points.

THE WHITE MOLL

By FRANK L. PACKARD

A Gripping Story of New York's East Side

(Copyright, 1921, by the Bell Syndicate, Inc.)

CHAPTER L. THE dark mouth of an alleyway thrown into murky relief by the rays of a distant street lamp—the swift, forward leap of a skulking "Yes," said Rhoda Gray again. figure—a girl's form swaying and struggling in the man's embrace. Then, a half threatening, half triumphant oath; and then the girl's voice, quiet, almost imperious: "Now, give me back that purse, please. Instantly!"

The rays of the street lamp, faint as they were, fell upon her, disclosing a sweet, oval face, out of which the dark eyes gazed steadily. And suddenly the man leaned forward, and then his hand went awkwardly to touch his cap.

"De White Moll!" he mumbled deferentially, and stepping nearer, returned the purse. "Scuse me, miss," he said uneasily. "I didn't know got to do is get the money before it was youse—honest to Gawd, I didn't! 'Scuse me, miss. Good night!"

"Dut there's something on to-night that I'd—I'd like to stop. All you've got to do is get the money before they do and then see that it goes to do is get the money before they do and then see that it goes to do is get the money before they do and then see that it goes to do is get the money before they do and then see that it goes to do is get the money before they do and then see that it goes to do is get the money before they do and then see that it goes the money before they do and then see that it goes the money before they do and then see that it goes the money before they do and then see that it goes the money before they do and then see that it goes the money before the money b

She went on, traversing block after block.

Her father had been a mining engineer, for many years resident in south America. He had come to New 18 years for consultation, and she had a companied him. They had taken a little flat, the engineer had placed himself in the hands of a famous specially and accompanied him. They had taken a little flat, the engineer had placed himself in the hands of a famous specially and an operation had been decided upon. A few days prior to 18 the date set for the operation the flat had been broken into during the sarily morning hours. The thief had been caught red-handed. The man had finally broken down and had told a miserable story.

My swore till you swore it! Tou swore it! Tou swore it! Tou swore it! Tou swore it! You swore it!

moll—take it from me!"
The White Moll!
Into the dark eyes, unbidden, came a sudden film and mist. Her father had died in the hospital and it had seemed as though her life, too, had gone out with his.
She had sought and found a genuine relief from her own sorow in doing what she could to alleviate the misery in that squalid underworld of New York.

That's all you know. I've got money. I take a private room. Get me my clothes; oh, for God's sake, get them, and give me the one chance that's left!"

"Where are your clothes?" asked Rhoda Gray.

"God bless you!" The tears were suddenly streaming down the grimy face. "The door! Leck the door first! Then you take the candle over there you."

Rhoda Gray halted before the door-way of a small, hovel-like, two-story building that was jammed in between two tenements. A second-hand clothes store occupied the ground floor, and housed the proprietor and his family back without a sound until it rested in an upright position against the abode of Gypsy Nan.

There was a separate entrance, apart from that into the store, and she pushed this door open and stepped forward into an absolutely black haliford a most convenient shelf.

The celling metamorphosed itself forward into an absolutely black haliford a most convenient shelf.

The roof sloped scarcely conscious of the direction she was taking. Then suddenly she locked at her watch. It was twenty minutes of one, and there was it is Skarbolov's—and her promise. She did not like this, but, on the other hand, she would make it again under the same conditions. She was going to Skarbolov's. Half-past 1, Gypsy Nan had said.

Her thoughts reverted to Gypsy Nan.

what she was, or where she got her money for the gin she bought, it was not in the ethics of the Bad Lands to inquire. She was just Gypsy Nan. At the head of the ladder-like stairs was a sort of narrow platform in front of the attic door. Rhoda Gray felt for the door, and knocked softly upon it. Receiving no reply, she tried the door, found it unlocked and opened it. and its light disclosed the motionless form of a woman on the bed.

Rhoda Gray stood looking down at the matted tangle of gray-streaked brown hair, at the heavy-lensed, old-fashioned, steel-bowed spectacles, still perched on the woman's nose; at the sallow face, streaked with grime and dirt, at a hand, as ill-cared for, which bushed them unsteadily into the pocket seriched on the woman's hose; at the dirt, at a hand, as ill-cared for, which lay exposed on the torn blankst; at the dirty shawl that enveloped the the dirty shawl that enveloped the thing about the woman's breathing that frightened her. "Nan!" she called again. Shoulder. "Nan!" she called again. Gypsy Nan opened her eyes, stared dully.

"Youse get t'hell outer here!" she croaked. "Get out!".

"I am going to," said Rhoda Gray dilly evenly. "Tim going to get a doctor. You've gone too far this time, Nan. "Shoulder wooked it again on the outside. "No, youse don't!" Gypsy Nan's voice rose in a sudden scream. She sat bolt upright in ted, and pulled a revolver out from under the coverings. "Youse put a finger on dat door, an' it won't be de door youse'll go out by!"

Rhoda Gray did not move. "Nan, put that revolver down!" she game!" Gypsy Nan's voice was scarcely audible. "Charlotte Green—that's all you know."

Phoda Gray glanced swiftly around black kid gloves, but, failing in this, thus, they washed them unsteadily into the pocket of her coat.

"I'm—all right," she asserted fierce y labeled them unsteadily into the pocket of her coat.

call some one?"
"Because," said Gypsy Nan, "I—I'd rather go out this way than in that horrible thing they call the 'chair.'
Oh, my God! I've seen pictures of it!
It's a horrible thing—a horrible thing "Yes

Nan. Rhoda Gray looked at her watch "Twenty-five minutes after tweive,"

"There's time yet, then," whispered Gypsy Nan. "Listen!" she said. "I'm not going to snitch on anybody else just because I'm through myself. But

Rhoda Gray heard the door open-

she pushed this door open and stepped forward into an absolutely black had-into a most convenient shelf. There forward into an absolutely black hall-way. She had found Gypsy Nan last night huddled in the lower doorway, and had helped the woman upstairs to her garret, whereupon Gypsy Nan has a character known far and wide in the underworld as one possessing an insatiable and unquenchable thirst. As to who she was, or what she was, or what she was, or where she got her money for the gin she bought, it was not in the ethics of the Bad Lands

I wouldn't have let you see what you body hiding the flashlight's rays thave," Nan answered heavily. "Hurry! the front windows, she examined

"Yes," said Rhoda Gray.

"Yes," said Rhoda Gray.

"Well, den, come back here an' sit down on de foot of de bed," Gypsy Nan commanded.

"Rhoda Gray did not move.

Green—that's all you know."

Rhoda Gray glanced swiftly around her. Far up the block under a street lamp—a policeman. She ran and called out to him. He turned and came running.

"There's—there's a woman down
has commanded.

Nan commanded.

They reached Gypsy Nan. The officer bent over her.
"I'll send in a call," he said, and started on the grown down the said, and

And then Gypsy Nan spoke again:
"Do—do you believe in God?"
"Yes," said Rhoda Gray simply.

"Do-do you think there is a chance even at the last-if-if, without stand? Then he'd never know he' been robbed when—he was dead—old wife—suffer then—I—rot to web wife—suffer then—I—get to make good—I—yes, yes!" she whispered. "Seven-three-nine! Seven-three"— and then a quick, light step. The Rhoda Gray halted before the doorway of a small, hovel-like, two-story building that was jammed in between sharply.

"Right in the centre. Now push up looked at her watch. It was twenty and content of the direction she was taking. Then suddenly she looked at her watch. It was twenty

Nan. "Seven-three-nine." What ad

ers was protruding outward. Rhod Gray pulled it open. It was very he low. Inside there lay a little pile banknotes, the one on top was a thou sand-dollar bill.

She reached in and took out the money-and then the shop was flooded with light. Over by the side wall, on

And then the man spoke with curious amazement: "My God—a woman!"
She knew the man, It was Rorke—
"Rough" Rorke of Headquarters.

"The White Moll! "The White Moil."
He was close beside her now.
"So this is what all the sweet charity's been about, eh?" he snapped.
"The White Moil, the Little Saint of the East Side. The White Moil—hell: You crooked little devil!"
What was there for her to say?
She was caught here at 1 o'clock in She was caught here at 1 o'clock in the morning after breaking into the place, caught red-handed in the very act of taking the money.

What was there to say-and, above all, to this man, whose reputation for callous brutality in the handling of callous brutality in the those who fell into his hands had earned him the sobriquet of "Rough"

"The officer returned.
"What do they say?" asked Rhoda "What do they say?" asked Rhoda "Came then the strident clang of a going and the whire of a motor.

Rhoda Gray shivered. Disgrace, ruin, stared her in the face. and to-night, in just a few minutes race— Rough Rorke opened the door and pulled her out to the street. A young unsteady on his legs, stopped to stare an' see me through?"

"Yes, Nan, I swear it."

Rhoda Gray leaned sharply forward. The woman's voice was the same; but the English was suddenly perfect now. they reached the door of a private of night! Eh—what's the lea?

Gypsy Nan shivered. "I thought I might be all right to-day and that I'd get better. But I didn't. It's my heart."

There was anxiety, perplexity, in Rhoda Gray's face. "Why didn't you call some one?"

"Because," said Gypsy Nan, "I—I'd "Rhoda Gray pressed Gypsy Nan's speeding down the street.
